

GILBERT IS RUGBY

1823-2026
200 YEARS OF RUGBY

FOREWORD BY JOHN TAYLOR

To look at the history of Gilbert is to look at the history of the game of rugby. Tracing the evolution of the ball is almost synonymous with the evolution of the game. Appropriately, the modern ball bears only a passing resemblance to those early Gilbert balls used at Rugby School.

Writing in the 1930s, EFT Bennett – who attended Rugby School in the 1860s, confirmed, “the shape of the ball came from the (pig’s) bladder and was a perfect ball for long drop kicks, or placing, and for dribbling too.” He then added (do I detect a hint of disapproval and regret?), “The modern plum-stone is good for none of these but seems meant for carrying and throwing or passing between the players.” He goes on to suggest, “70 yards was not at all an impossible kick,” and bemoans the fact that, “Few now think of trying a goal even from 30 yards.” You almost feel he wanted more kicking and believed William Webb-Ellis had taken at least one step too far.

The evolution from what was still essentially ‘football’ has progressed ever since, as has the ball. The modern ‘Gilbert’ is very different to the one I was kicking 50 years ago. The shiny leather ball might have gone a long way if it was dry but was always more difficult to handle and like a bar of soap combined with a lead balloon when wet and muddy – if that is not a contradiction.

Having helped to negotiate some of the Gilbert international contracts over the past 20 years, I now realise how much science goes into the research and development of the modern ball. The Gilbert technical team design and manufacture a customised ball with characteristics that suit different aspects of the game. I have learned a great deal about the optimum number of pimples and the effects that their depth and shape variation can have on handling and ball flight!

For Sevens, handling is the most important factor so grip is maximised and kicking distances sacrificed, whilst the demands of the XV-a-side game are for a balanced ball that performs equally as well in hand as it does in flight (although there are no longer many 70 yard penalties – thank goodness).

Consistency has become such a key aspect of the game for all players at the top level of the sport, that all major nations now use the same Gilbert ball. The very recent introduction of the ‘Smart’ ball should serve to further cement the long standing relationship Gilbert has with the game, well into the future.

So bring it on – here’s to the next 200 years!

CHOOSING YOUR RUGBY BALL

Training vs Match ball

Gilbert training rugby balls are made with cost and resilience in mind so they can withstand the rigours of multiple training sessions. They are made with a higher percentage of synthetic rubber rather than natural rubber which makes them a more robust ball, but also reduces the natural grip properties. Because of this

Gilbert have introduced the patented triangular surface grip pattern on our G-TR 4000 training balls.

Gilbert match rugby balls on the other hand have been designed and produced with high performance in mind. Due to the performance nature, match balls are more expensive and therefore are often used in team run-throughs and matches rather than regular training sessions. Gilbert match balls are made with more natural rubber which naturally enhances the grip, essential for match play. An additional feature that all Gilbert match balls benefit from is the patented Truflight™ valve, positioned in seam. This in turn augments spin and flight. All of these performance features make a match ball higher in price than a training ball.
